Many students face the dilemma of having input but no output—they may understand spoken and written Chinese, but when it comes to writing, they don't know how to begin. They often have ideas in their minds but struggle to put them into words. This course is designed to help Chinese-American children overcome the challenge of having “nothing to write” or “nowhere to start.” Through training in techniques such as reading model essays, imitation writing, and expansion exercises, students will learn how to express their thoughts clearly on paper. At the same time, they will learn to apply vocabulary they have previously learned, deepening their understanding of Chinese words, grammar, and cultural expressions through writing practice. Course Structure: The curriculum progresses from simple to more complex topics, covering practical
